A Colored Man Arrested for Marrying a White Woman.

Henry Patton, colored, was arrested yesterday under Section 2,136 of the Revised Statutes, making it a penal offense for anyone having one-eighth or more of negro blood to marry a white woman. The affidavit was filed by T. W. Christian, and when arraigned in Johnston's Court, Patton waived preliminary examination and was placed under $1,000 bonds to wait Grand Jury action. The penalty for the offense with which Patton is charged is fine and imprisonment, the former not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 and the latter at the way from one to twelve months. The marriage took place on the 14th of the present month, the woman being Sadie Davis, alias McCorkle, and the minister Rev. Jacob Raynor, pastor of the New Bethel Church. An affidavit was also filed against the minister, under the law imposing a fine of $1,000 on anyone who assists in any way in a marriage between a white and a black. Patton claims that he did not know the marriage was contrary to law, and declares that there are many such cases in the city and no attempt is made at concealment of the fact. He claims that he would not have been molested except for the fact that he shot Christian and for which he was sent North for two years. At that time the woman whom he married seventeen days ago was the wife of an old colored man named Wells from whom she afterward separated. Judge Howe declaring the marriage null and void.

"A CELEBRATED CASE" AT THE GRAND. Large and delighted audiences continue to witness the performances given each afternoon and evening at the Grand by the Arne Walker Dramatic Company. Last night D'Emery's famous melodrama, "A Celebrated Case," was given its first presentation, and scored an instantaneous success. It is not saying too much to state that the Walker Company give it one of the best interpretations ever seen here, and they stage and costume it far better than it has ever been done here before. Miss Arne Walker made a charming "Adrienne" while Mr. Irvin Walker, as "Jean Renaud," appears to better advantage than in any role he has assumed this week. The other parts were all well taken care of by the other members of the company. "East Lynne" will be given at the matinee to-day, and to-night the engagement case with a repetition of "A Celebrated Case." Popular prices—10 and 20 cents.

ADAM FOREPAUGH. The Philadelphia Sunday Dispatch, of April 5, has the following to say of the Forepaugh show:

"This mammoth aggregation of wonders contains twenty elephants, three camels, a regiment of circus performers, and the great Kabowles, the marvel of Moscow. This phenomenal creature is a comely woman, of small stature, possessing extraordinary symmetry of form and agility. Her curious and original feats are set down as real miracles, and defy the skill of the greatest acrobats of the world. One of her deeds is called a chair pyramid, and is described as the most marvelous performance ever accomplished in the wide range of gymnastics. She ascends a pyramid of chairs, making evolutions as she passes round and round, until she reaches the top, thirty-five feet from the earth. After a moment's pause for breath, she springs from her elevation, making a head-foremost dive to the earth, and a complete change of wardrobe from dress to corset, in her upward flight. She alights with outstretched hands on a cushioned table, which stands on the ground, and with lightning velocity throws a graceful and lofty somersault. Attaching eagle wings to her shoulders she arises proudly, like the king of birds, and floats through the air, over steeples, domes, monuments, with the most apparent ease. She is known throughout the capitals of Europe as the 'winged woman.'"

"Adam Forepaugh sent his only son all the way to Moscow to engage and secure the much-coveted mission proved successful, and she will appear here at his grand opening with his immense show, which, by the way, has been greatly reinforced and strengthened for the present season."

Exhibits at Indianapolis Monday, May 23.

The Pfaffin Piano Recital.

There was a large and select audience present at Pfaffin's Music Hall last evening, it being the occasion of the piano recital given by Emil Liebling, of Chicago, assisted by the Apollo Quartet, of this city. Mr. Liebling had carefully prepared a varied programme, the selections comprising classical works of all the great composers, and embracing every style of expression known to the musical world capable of being produced upon the piano. From the first number it was made evident to the audience that the distinguished gentleman was a complete master of the instrument, and, until the conclusion of the programme, every succeeding number was listened to and enjoyed with almost breathless silence. Never has an artist appeared in this city with a more thorough technique or excellent touch. The distinct feature of his playing is the sympathetic quality with which he is enabled to carry his listeners at will. The Apollo Quartet are to be congratulated for the satisfactory manner in which they assisted Mr. Liebling, and too much praise can not be given the firm of Theo. Pfaffin & Co. for the enterprise exhibited in giving such an excellent treat to our musical public.

Mr. Emil Liebling was born at Pless, one of the frontier cities of Austria, on the 12th of April, 1851. He came from a musical family, and at an early age evinced unusual musical abilities. He was placed under the instruction of Adam Kong, the blind pianist. After a short period his parents removed to Berlin, in order to take advantage of what musical opportunities the city offered for their son, and there he studied with Heinrich Ehrlich. At the early age of twelve years he appeared in Liebling's symphony concerts in Berlin, playing with his teacher the E flat sonata by Moschelles and the D flat sonata by Thalberg. In 1867 he came to this country, and accepted a position in a ladies' school in Kentucky, and remained until 1871, when he returned to Europe, remaining abroad a year, and upon his return located at Chicago. A second time he crossed the ocean, and in 1874 and 1875 studied in Berlin, with Kallack. During this absence he sojourned for a brief period with Liszt at Weimer. Like all great artists, Mr. Liebling gives to the public a series of recitals, containing all the important works in piano literature, and since residing in this country has appeared with the Thomas orchestra and in concerts with Wilhelm. He also bears quite a reputation as a composer. Among his publications, well known and extensively sold, are "Nocturne," "First Meeting," "Le Meteor," "Calop de Concert," "Gavotte Modern," "Valse de Concert" and several songs. It is useless to attempt to criticize the individual numbers which comprised the programme last evening. Suffice it to say that the entire performance was a brilliant success and in the nature of a revelation to those present, including as it did almost our entire musical population.

THOMAS F. MARSHALL.

Anecdotes of the Most Brilliant Orator Kentucky has Produced—The Crushing Defeat He Administered to a Rival Many Years Ago.

I have alluded to John Quincy Adams, writes a correspondent to the Louisville Courier-Journal. His name recalls that of Thomas F. Marshall, the most brilliant man that even Kentucky has produced. In an evil hour Marshall had a discussion with the "old man eloquent" upon a matter of fact, and as a result was badly worsted, as Henry Clay himself was worsted, by an appeal to Adams. It would have been the same with Marshall, had he not been so well prepared. President Lincoln on all such occasions, Marshall was the most eloquent man of his day. His speech had the dulcet sweetness of the harp of Orpheus, and was as persuasive as the plea of Phryne before the historic court. It would have softened the marble bosom of Rhadamanthus and planted the germ of mercy in his flinty heart. Marshall was a singular genius, as erratic as Peterboro and as gifted as Admiral Orlion, though a slave to his passions and without individuality of character sufficient to resist temptation or reform a broken life. Like Sir William Yonge, "nothing but such a character could drag down such parts, and nothing but such parts could sustain such a character."

Until he was elected to Congress Marshall's convivial habits had not obtained the mastery over him.

He once went to Philadelphia to deliver a lecture, the subject of which was the "Life and Character of Napoleon the Great." There was much curiosity to hear him, for his fame as an orator was national, and the lecture had remarkable excellencies in a literary, historical, and critical point of view. The hall was filled with the beauty, grace and culture of the Quaker City. When the lecturer appeared before his audience he was "pretty good," that is,

He was not "far" but just had plenty.

and he began to repeat his lecture after first in interpolating the following:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I have not a doubt that Napoleon Bonaparte was a direct lineal descendant and heir-at-law of a 'woods cut' of Julius Cæsar begetten while that hero was on his way of conquest on the banks of the Adriatic or in one of the isles of the Mediterranean."

The thought was well received, and he delivered his lecture with his accustomed eloquence. He was a great lover of Shakespeare, and in the best plays from stem to stern. He possessed a brilliant, lurid, gorgeous imagination, which gave a hue to everything that emanated from him, while there was a happy originality exemplified in all his utterances. He illustrated Cæsar's sentence, "You must die a month or so, will be the most stupor of what he should be and he will yet put forth green leaves."

He defended Matt Ward for the murder of Professor Butler, in Louisville, about thirty years ago. It was indeed a celebrated case, communities all over the State were divided. His guilt or innocence became a political issue. The interest was great beyond the limits of the State. George D. Prentice, the life-long friend of the father of the accused, championed the cause of the son of his friend in the columns of the Louisville Journal, and narrowly escaped mob vengeance. His office was sacked and gutted. A change of venue was had, and an array of counsel such as has rarely been equaled appeared for the defense. Besides Marshall there were Crittenden, Helm, Wolfe, Wood and others, but it was universally conceded that Marshall's speech surpassed all the others. An eyewitness says that one sentence in his speech cleared the accused. With an attitude Garrick would have studied and a tone Talm would have envied, at the close of a climax, he exclaimed, "Will you tear him from his girl wife?" There was not a dry eye in the room, and the judge upon the bench sobbed like a child. He was once one of a party of hunters in the mountains of Kentucky. They had been camped for more than a week, and were composed of the flower of Lexington, cultured gentlemen, young and old. When night overtook them, and the evening meal prepared and eaten, the party gathered around the camp fire and discussed every subject that offered food for the contemplative mind. At that hour Marshall was the leader. No other member of the party was so daring in speculation or illustrated his theories with such splendor and copiousness of imagery. Till long past midnight he held his audience of more than a score of cultured and learned gentlemen entranced. He was eloquent then when on the stump, and often his listeners were still enthralled when dawn appeared in the East. One night it was proposed that he preach a sermon from any text that he might select. He chose the passage, "The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man has not where to lay his head." For a long time he commented on the life and character of the Savior. He presented the theology of the Nazarene in a novel and attractive light. He discouraged of love and preached all of humanity, all of human longing for peace and security. He brought a tear to every eye, and sent a thrill through every heart in that room, more than that of whom had been skeptical until that day, but were so no more forever.

When Henry Clay died, Marshall delivered an eulogy upon his life and character that has become a classic. Longfellow declared that it surpassed anything ever uttered by the lips of man, and Daniel S. Dickinson said that he had rather have been the author of it than to have written "Hamlet."

With one or two anecdotes I will close this sketch of this most gifted man. Marshall went into the town of Versailles one day when John J. Crittenden had an appointment to make a stump speech. Marshall asked and received a division of time, and the "wool-pulling" began. Many ladies were present, and to show their displeasure with Marshall's course, as well as to compliment Crittenden, they covered the latter's head with flowers and waved their handkerchiefs in approval. Crittenden acknowledged the compliment in a graceful and happy manner, and Marshall rose to reply. He was more than usually eloquent, and made a splendid speech. At its close he turned to the ladies and said:

"No bouquets for me! Ladies, I was born at that early day in Kentucky when the aesthetic had not supplanted the utilitarian, when girls, instead of cultivating the useless graces that attract the frivolous, practiced those habits of usefulness that fitted them to be wives of brave men and mothers of sturdy children. In the primitive day the maiden had no bower where Flora held her court, but, on the contrary, they planted and nourished ample beds of mint and tansy. In the early morning, when the dew was on the hold took down his 'stirrup' cup and brewed a beverage whose basis was 'old Bourbon,' such as Bacchus never offered to Olympian deity, and all the family, from eldest to youngest, partook of it in copious draughts, and, ladies, you never heard of a child dying of worms in 1800. If Fabius had lived then he would have starved to death."

Shouts of laughter greeted the conceits, and the ladies precipitately fled. One more anecdote: There lived in Kentucky, thirty or forty years ago, a man named Pilcher. He would require the pen of Fielding and the license that permitted the portraiture of "Squire Weston to properly sketch his character. He was a rude, uncultured, sapient man, with great natural abilities; a scorpion tongue, laden with the poison of envy. He was as dissolute as John Wilkes, and his temper was fitly described by O'Connell's epithet, "ram-cot." He was a sort of political Dalgetty, and, with the vulgar herd, a considerable force. He had vanquished every opponent who would consent to meet him, even old Ben Hardin, whom John Randolph said was a "kitchen knife whetted on a brickbat." But in invective, his most powerful weapon, he found his master in Pilcher.

Such was the man who was pitted against Marshall. They met at Louisville on Corn Island, a lovely spot near the Kentucky shore in Ohio. The crowd assembled just at nightfall, and was composed of the beauty, wealth and worth of the city. It was in the early days of Marshall's career, when his budding genius gave promise of the greatness of the future. The crowd was Marshall, though Pilcher had friends in the throng.

Marshall delivered the greatest speech even he ever made. The audience was with him, and he revealed in an ecstasy of eloquence. He seemed inspired with more than mortal power, and swayed strong men and beautiful women as the storm the ripening harvest. In closing, he pictured the scene before him, and made it as vivid to his hearers as to his own prodigy of imagination. La Belle Riviere, the silvery moon and its soft light and balmy breeze with the delicate and delicious perfume of a season's fruition; the vanities, studded with countless sparkling gems, all passed in review and received the impress of his matchless fancy. His audience hung breathless on his sentences. In the midst of a burst of descriptive eloquence he turned to where Pilcher sat, a few feet off. Pointing his expressive finger and throwing into his classic and mobile features a look of unutterable horror, he exclaimed: "But, O God, there is Pilcher!" It was the devil in Eden. The audience broke all bounds and cheered, laughed and wept. The orator sat down and Pilcher, conquered once, declined to speak. He said afterward that at the moment the look came upon Marshall's features and his voice uttered those words, he felt himself to be the vilest of created beings.

Advice to Mothers.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used when children are cutting teeth. It relieves the little sufferer at once. It produces natural, quiet sleep, by relieving the child from pain, and the little cherub awakes as "bright as a button." It is very pleasant to taste. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, relieves wind, regulates the bowels, and is the best remedy for diarrhea, whether arising from teething or other causes. Twenty-five cents a bottle.
